NOTABLE FIGURES IN BASEBALL. John W. Oliver played baseball eighty-eight years ago, and played it under the name it goes by today. Such, at all events, was the testimony of the nonagenarian editor, reformer and orator, given a few years before his death, which occurred not long ago. Mr. Oliver was visited by a commission made up of Henry Chadwick, "the father of baseball," Charles McDonald, of New York, and Samuel Winslow, of Worcester, Mass.

There has been a disagreement among the authorities as to the origin of the game. Mr. Chadwick held it to be a development of the old English "rounders." Mr. Albert G. Spalding, equally famous in the national sport, firmly opposed (and still opposes) this theory. The commission named was appointed to make inquiries. When the three members asked Mr. Oliver about it, he told them he had played baseball in Baltimore when he was eight years old—and he was ninety-one at the time he was queried.

"It was called baseball then," he said, "the same as it is today." He told the two captains of the opposing sides, tossed the flat paddle we used in place of a bat, and when it was caught he placed his hands higher and higher, in turn, until the one whose hand covered the top won the first chance to bat and first choice of players. The other captain picked the boy he considered next best, and so it went, until the sides had been chosen.

Just as there are four bases today, so there were four bases eighty years ago. But there was no pitcher. The man at the plate flung the ball into the air and batted it, as is today done in practice work by the big teams. When he hit the ball with the flat paddle, he ran, and all on his side who were on the bases ran likewise.

"We put the runners out by hitting them with the ball, but you must know that the ball of those days wasn't the dangerous missile it is now. It was made of yarn ravelings from old socks, and it didn't hurt when it hit you."

"All the Baltimore boys played this game, which we knew as baseball, because we used a ball and ran around the bases. Edwin Booth and J. Wilkes Booth were my mates on many an occasion. I was born in England, but I cannot take credit to England for fathering baseball. It was from my earliest knowledge of it a game by itself, and not an evolution of the old English rounders. America is entitled to the credit for originating baseball."

Robinson, the new president of the Colt factory, who invited Colonel Mosby to visit his factory this afternoon. During the war Colonel Mosby and his rangers relied on the Colt for short range work. There is a close bond of sympathy, twist the Colonel may say, "I succeeded in making sundry Colt pellets into other folks' systems, all of which is the fortune of war."

The Colonel was greatly interested to know that Colonel Colt lived to see the revolver form of his firearm developed. In the war days, he recalled, they had to use percussion caps to secure a discharge. This, of course, was rather inconvenient. Colonel Mosby started for the Colt factory right after lunch, and he planned to spend a very enjoyable afternoon going through the great armory.
